

Linda Nastari, LCSW
1101 S. Winchester Blvd. Suite #A101
San Jose, CA 95128
408.358.5414

When to Consider an Elder Care Consultant

As people reach their retirement years, they are concerned about managing their affairs.

These issues include decisions about:

- health care, such as continuing to live at home with help versus living in an independent/assisted living facility;
- having a health care directive or proxy;
- estate planning: having a will versus a trust and who will be the executor or trustee;
- appointment of a power of attorney over finances and health care.

Many of these decisions are made with estate attorneys and financial planners. An elder care consultant can be beneficial when matters are complicated by financial hardship, divorce, strained parent/child or sibling/sibling relationships, mental illness, substance abuse, or other family issues that impact trust, resources, and communication.

An elder care consultant can help the elderly and their families:

- understand the needs of the parent(s) and family members;
- help a family member or members with emotional issues that are impacting their ability to think clearly about a situation;
- reduce the emotional stress;
- resolve conflict so that the parent(s) are better cared for and family members can be more supportive of one another.

When a person becomes elderly, their need for assistance generally increases, placing additional stress on the family. Adult children need to interact with one another, and views and ideas about how their roles should be executed will vary. Even family members who otherwise get along might have difficulty, given the stress of the demands of their own lives, a change in parent/child roles, and grieving the loss of a parent. There may already exist strained relationships among the children who really do not want to cooperate. Also, each adult child will have different relationships and roles within the family and to each parent. They will also be at different stages in their own lives; some will have more or less of time, finances, or emotional support to help an aging parent. Issues of equality and fairness become apparent. All of these factors can threaten family relations in the years to come. Conflict, disagreement, and poor communication can cause additional stress to the aging parent.

Although, each family is unique, here are some examples where a family consultant could be of benefit

- A mother of 5 in her mid 80's who has suffered a broken hip and has the beginning stages of dementia. Decisions need to be made to move her to an assisted living community. Amidst these decisions are decisions about managing her finances, real estate property, and looking over her will. Among the 5 adult children there are disagreements about every aspect of her care. This occurred even though a will had been done and power of attorneys appointed.
- A mother in her late 70's with an adult daughter, age 50, living with her. There is one son who lives two hours away. The son is accusing his sister of mismanaging the mother's finances. He worries that his sister has a drinking problem, and that she is not adequately caring for the mother. The mother continues to allow her daughter to live with her,

Linda Nastari, LCSW
1101 S. Winchester Blvd. Suite #A101
San Jose, CA 95128
408.358.5414

- stating, “where else would she live”. The mother is competent and does not allow the son to have any say regarding her affairs.
- A very successful business man in his early 90’s suffering from dementia. He is married to his wife of 60 years. She has suffered a mild stroke 5 years earlier, but states she can continue to care for him. There are two adult children, one is single, working fulltime and the other is married living out of state. They both agree that more care is needed, but cannot agree on the type of care, nor how much to spend. The daughter who lives close by resents that the majority of the responsibility is falling on her. She feels that her sister does not fully understand the level of need of her parents, nor the time it demands from her.

In each of these three scenarios an elder care consultant would be helpful in talking with the various family members so that their parent’s wishes would be honored, the elderly parent would be adequately cared for, and family relations would be preserved as much as is possible. Often times, when these underlying emotional/relational issues are addressed, the necessary decisions can be made with far less stress. An elder care consultant can make the difference to a family’s emotional health by becoming another vital part of the team in an elder state plan.

As people reach their retirement years, they are concerned about managing their affairs.

These issues include decisions about:

- health care, such as continuing to live at home with help versus living in an independent/assisted living facility;
- having a health care directive or proxy;
- estate planning: having a will versus a trust and who will be the executor or trustee;
- appointment of a power of attorney over finances and health care.

Many of these decisions are made with estate attorneys and financial planners. An elder care consultant can be beneficial when matters are complicated by financial hardship, divorce, strained parent/child or sibling/sibling relationships, mental illness, substance abuse, or other family issues that impact trust, resources, and communication.

An elder care consultant can help the elderly and their families:

- understand the needs of the parent(s) and family members;
- help a family member or members with emotional issues that are impacting their ability to think clearly about a situation;
- reduce the emotional stress;
- resolve conflict so that the parent(s) are better cared for and family members can be more supportive of one another.

When a person becomes elderly, their need for assistance generally increases, placing additional stress on the family. Adult children need to interact with one another, and views and ideas about how their roles should be executed will vary. Even family members who otherwise get along might have difficulty, given the stress of the demands of their own lives, a change in parent/child roles, and grieving the loss of a parent. There may already exist strained relationships among the children who really do not want to cooperate. Also, each adult child will have different relationships and roles within the family and to each parent. They will also be at different stages in their own lives; some will have more or less of time, finances, or emotional support to help an

Linda Nastari, LCSW
1101 S. Winchester Blvd. Suite #A101
San Jose, CA 95128
408.358.5414

aging parent. Issues of equality and fairness become apparent. All of these factors can threaten family relations in the years to come. Conflict, disagreement, and poor communication can cause additional stress to the aging parent.

Although, each family is unique, here are some examples where a family consultant could be of benefit

- A mother of 5 in her mid 80's who has suffered a broken hip and has the beginning stages of dementia. Decisions need to be made to move her to an assisted living community. Amidst these decisions are decisions about managing her finances, real estate property, and looking over her will. Among the 5 adult children there are disagreements about every aspect of her care. This occurred even though a will had been done and power of attorneys appointed.
- A mother in her late 70's with an adult daughter, age 50, living with her. There is one son who lives two hours away. The son is accusing his sister of mismanaging the mother's finances. He worries that his sister has a drinking problem, and that she is not adequately caring for the mother. The mother continues to allow her daughter to live with her, stating, "where else would she live". The mother is competent and does not allow the son to have any say regarding her affairs.
- A very successful businessman in his early 90's suffering from dementia. He is married to his wife of 60 years. She has suffered a mild stroke 5 years earlier, but states she can continue to care for him. There are two adult children, one is single, working fulltime and the other is married living out of state. They both agree that more care is needed, but cannot agree on the type of care, nor how much to spend. The daughter who lives close by resents that the majority of the responsibility is falling on her. She feels that her sister does not fully understand the level of need of her parents, nor the time it demands from her.

In each of these three scenarios an elder care consultant would be helpful in talking with the various family members so that their parent's wishes would be honored, the elderly parent would be adequately cared for, and family relations would be preserved as much as is possible. Often times, when these underlying emotional/relational issues are addressed, the necessary decisions can be made with far less stress. An elder care consultant can make the difference to a family's emotional health by becoming another vital part of the team in an elder state plan.